The afternoon did not arrive all at once. It leaked slowly into the room, stretching shadows across the floor in ways that felt deliberate but explained nothing. Someone had left a notebook open on the table, its pages filled with half-finished thoughts, arrows pointing nowhere, and sentences that stopped just before meaning could settle. Outside, a bus passed, carrying conversations that never intended to be overheard. Inside, time behaved strangely. Minutes folded into each other. A list appeared in the margin of the page—milk, window, blue—then was crossed out for no apparent reason. There was no form to fill, no instruction to follow, no identity to confirm. Just fragments, observations, and the quiet sense that the document existed only because it could.